DUANE MERRELL¹, Brigham Young University

Brigham Young University has a unique environment in that we have helped over 140 students receive teaching credentials since 2004. This past year 2014-2015 17 new students left with certification to teach physics. What is it that helps Brigham Young University to work with students looking to be physics teachers that maybe different than at other Universities. We will outline what the BYU teaching program looks like and see if there are any opportunities for others to think about the physics teaching program.

¹Brigham Young University has been able help over 140 students getting teaching credentials for high school physics during the last 11 years. These students have come from many backgrounds and regions but all come through BYU's physics department.
