Farm Hall 75 Years Later

DAVID CASSIDY, Hofstra University

At the end of World War II, British agents held 10 captured German atomic scientists at Farm Hall for a period before, during, and after the atomic bombing of Japan. The scientists recorded conversations and later statements and documents released over the years have sparked repeated controversy about the German nuclear effort. After 75 years, what do we now know? What don't we know? And what is the legacy of Farm Hall?
